WHAT DOES THEATRE TRIGGER ?

To successfully impersonate a character, an actor needs to control his body and, at the same time, he has to reproduce the character's emotions and way of thinking, and to identify with his social role.

This need could allow patients to develop new strategies for carefully controlling their bodies and minds within a protected environment (where they do not feel judged by others).

These unique features make theatre an ideal playground for deeply motivating patients, allowing them to reacquire the control of their social, psychological and emotional life and to transfer these abilities to everyday life situations.
